Off-White

Who says the bride should always wear white?

That trend has been practically set in stone for hundreds of years, but may be ever-so-slightly shifting. Some brides prefer smaller, more casual weddings to traditional formal affairs. Others are simply drawn to a more modern aesthetic.

For our annual bridal issue, we visited Cerulean Gallery's new downtown location in the Canyon Exploration building. Surrounded by contemporary art, we created a few eye-catching wedding fashions that exist outside traditional bridal wear and its insistence on a formal, white dress and veil. We think the results are perfectly stunning.

Who needs a dress when you can combine this textured crop top with wide-leg trousers? The ever-changing sequins – which shift from matte to glossy – make this understated, elegant outfit ideal for an independent bride and casual ceremony.

Innocence aligns with a playful, dreamlike quality with this look, which combines a casual sweater with an over-the-top feminine skirt (don't tell, but it was once part of a prom dress). We love this for a young, confident bride.

White suddenly seems boring once you encounter this vivid, printed ball gown, combined with a menswear-inspired shirt by designer Karl Lagerfeld. The overall look suggests classic, Spanish-influenced Hollywood – and is guaranteed to turn heads.

By covering a romantic, feminine strapless gown with a tuxedo shirt, we pushed the traditional bridal look toward the contemporary edge. Her wedding day has been every bride's fantasy for years. Might as well dress the part. Call it "alt-bride."

You can't get any less traditional than this approach, which was inspired by a Parisian designer. Slim cigarette pants. A cape jacket. The lace corset-like top softens the masculine look, making this a bold, modern take on bridal femininity.

Remind them of Audrey Hepburn with this classy pairing. The skirt's luxurious layers of tulle are offset by the matte satin trim. The top? It's a black cardigan worn backwards to give it a plunging, eye-catching back. A bold new approach to old glamour.
